

I thought the last lecture was a very intriguing discussion. I love how he starts by talking about his childhood dreams and how you should think about how to enable others to make theirs come true. I had never thought about my childhood dreams in the sense that other people also have them too and probably aren't able to obtain them. I could at least try to encourage them to reach for them.

One thing that really stuck for me was when he said, "Experience is what you get when you didn't get what you wanted." I had to think, is that really true? And it really is. Everytime that something hasn't quite worked out for me I've got such great insight into the world around me and what I should do next. Even if it's just keeping in mind that I should keep going.

He also mentions that when you're doing something badly and no one bothers to tell you that's a bad place to be. If no one is giving you advice anymore that means they've given up with trying to get you to learn something that maybe you don't seem that interested in. Maybe you'll have to start taking things into your own hands at this point or even address the issue with whomever your instructor may be.

The last thing that I thought that stuck out to me was the "have something to bring to the table." Which to me means never stop learning. You honestly never know what will come in handy one day or will give you the leg up when it comes to working on something new. Especially when it comes to the workforce. I thought this was a great line coming from him because he seems like someone who is committed to being the best at what he does with a variety of skills.

I identified with a lot of these feelings and thought ideas on more than one level and I loved hearing someone so enthusiastic talk about all of this. I would even recommend this video to other people that aren't feeling too sure about the things they invest their time into.
